Mr. White's Appointment.

The appointment, on Saturday, of Hon. A. B. White, of Parkersburg, to be collector of internal revenue for West Virginia, ended a most friendly contest lasting several weeks, mainly between Mr. White and Hon. Thomas E. Davis, of Grafton, other applicants having practically withdrawn. It was very hard to decide between two such good men and good Republicans, but the President finally made his decision in favor of Mr. White, for whom he had a warm personal feeling, and Mr. Davis yielded gracefully to the verdict.

No mistake could have been made politically or otherwise in the appointment of either of the gentlemen, the matter simply resolving itself into the question of a choice between two good men. Mr. White, the successful candidate, as editor of the Parkersburg State Journal, as secretary of the state Republican committee during the last campaign, and as an earnest party worker in all campaigns, has earned the recognition which he has received.

As collector under the Harrison administration he made an excellent record, which is a sufficient guarantee that his administration of the office under the present administration will be satisfactory to the public and a credit to himself. The Intelligencer joins with all good Republicans in West Virginia, regardless of what their personal choice was previous to the appointment, in extending to Collector White hearty congratulations.

McLean's Scheme.

John R. McLean, who wants to be a free silver Democratic senator from Ohio, but who never will be, announces that he is making an investigation and will publish to the world the amount of money "spent by Mark Hanna" during last year's presidential campaign. This means that Mr. McLean intends to conduct a campaign of slander and personal vilification against Mr. Hanna. That is just the sort of a campaign that will be pleasing to the silverites. They dare not go before the people with their silver question and argue it on its merits. Attention must be diverted from the main question and from McLean's own very vulnerable personality by a campaign of personal abuse of Mr. Hanna, who committed the unpardonable sin of conducting a successful campaign against the aggregation of discordant elements and political heresies of 1896.

Of course, everything Mr. McLean (who is himself something of a boodler) publishes, as the alleged result of an "investigation" by men paid to do the lying, will be eagerly read and circulated by the silverites, who will not pause to consider the real motive back of it all, and we may look for such a campaign of infamous slander as Mr. McLean's hired men are capable of, regardless of the issues involved in the choice between a free trade and dishonest money candidate and one who believes in a sound currency and a tariff for the protection of American industries. If there is to be such a campaign Republicans have nothing to lose. It will simply react upon the political thugs who force it.

Ireland and the Queen's Jubilee.

The people of Ireland will not join heartily in the celebration of the queen's jubilee this week. Of all Victoria's subjects the Irish alone feel that there is nothing in the past sixty years of her reign for them to be thankful for and they can see no hope for the future. The reign of Victoria has been notable for the great progress that has been made by England, and the queen herself is respected and honored by the whole world for her womanly virtues, but poor Ireland cannot, with a sincere heart, join in the rejoicings on the occasion of the celebration of her anniversary, much as the Irish may admire her as a woman.

During that sixty years, while England has prospered, Ireland has not. Under the policy pursued toward her by England she has degenerated, has been deprived of the liberty enjoyed by the remainder of English dependencies; while the Englishman's taxes have been reduced, the Irishman's taxes have been doubled.

The rule under which Ireland has suffered has, to use the language of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, driven her back to a condition to which no civilized country has been reduced in modern times except by devastating war. Mr. O'Connor who is an Irish member of parliament, in speaking of the coming jubilee and the position of the Irish people, inquires: "Are we to rejoice because Ireland's population has decreased 47 per cent, while England's has increased 79 per cent? Is it because Ireland, with her diminished population is so pauperized that two thirds of her people are dependent on the potato crop, the failure of which immediately produces famine, while the standard general comfort in England is higher than in any other country?"

Mr. O'Connor further shows that in Ireland, during the past sixty years, the number of paupers in every 1,000 of Ireland's population has increased from 52 to 95, while in England it has decreased in the same time from 49 to 26. All these things and more, added to her political oppression and the denial of personal rights to her citizens, are what Ireland has to be thankful for on this great jubilee occasion, when all the civilized world save Ireland will join in congratulating the queen of England on her wonderful sixty years' reign and in honoring her for her personal goodness.

The Irish people know full well that the queen herself is not to blame for their country's sufferings; the fault has been with the policy of the government of which she has been merely the figure head. They may feel no resentment toward Victoria herself, but their hearts cannot respond to the sentiment of a day of national rejoicing over what has been accomplished during her reign. It is not human nature to do so, and there is as much human nature in the honest Irish heart as in the heart of any other race.

Who knows but the sad contrast between the character of the celebrations in Ireland among the common people and those that are held in the other countries over which Victoria rules may serve to attract the attention of English statesmen and impress them as they have never been impressed before, and awaken the sympathy and sense of justice which have so long lain dormant in their breasts. It would indeed be adding to England's glory could it be said by the future historian that this, the greatest national jubilee of modern times, marked the turning point when England set about to wipe from her record the one disgrace which she still rests under, and undid, so far as was in her power, the wrongs of a century.

Secretary Sherman.

The whole country will hope that the reports which are being published from Washington to the effect that the venerable and honored secretary of state, Mr. Sherman, is succumbing to the effects of his long and active career, are overdrawn. The story of his lapses of memory, and other alleged evidences of a mental decline, is told with so much circumstance over the signatures of correspondents of reputation, as to almost compel belief, and yet the millions of Americans who have watched and admired the distinguished career of the great statesman will be slow to believe it. If it is true, nothing but words of regret and sympathy will be heard all over the land from political friend and foe alike.

Mr. Sherman is past the allotted years of man and yet is in active public life where he has been, without a break, for almost half a century. During all this time, as representative in Congress from 1854 to 1861, as United States senator from 1861 to 1867, including the most critical and stirring years of our history, then as secretary of the treasury until 1881, then in the senate again until the present year, when he was called into the President's official family—throughout all these years Secretary Sherman's life has been one of tremendous mental activity.

It would not be strange, therefore, if after all, now that years are bearing heavily upon him, that there should be a giving away of the tired brain and body. If the result that is so freely predicted should come, an enforced retirement from the cabinet, Mr. Sherman will go into private life with the consciousness of having lived a long public career which has been full of honor to himself and usefulness to his country—and he will carry with him the love and respect of his countrymen whose confidence he has enjoyed through many years.

To End the Cuban War.

It is said that when Hon. Stewart L. Woodford, the newly appointed minister to Spain, sails for Madrid he will carry with him from President McKinley the diplomatic proposal to the Spanish government which, if accepted by all parties, will put an end to the bloodshed and other horrors of war in Cuba. It is reported on apparent good authority that this proposition is for the granting to Cuba of complete autonomy, with her own legislature and her own governor, occupying the same relation to Spain that Canada does to England.

It is also said that President McKinley has ascertained through diplomatic channels that Spain will be glad enough to end the war in this way and to surrender to the Cubans the right of home rule. Whether or not the Cuban junta will accept the terms remains to be seen. The Cuban leaders still cling to the hope of complete independence and a Cuban republic. Spain will never consent to this, and the only way in which this country could interfere to that extent would be through war which would cost many precious American lives.

The President's desire is to secure to Cuba just taxation, the right to rule themselves, and relief from oppression, peacefully and diplomatically and with honor to this country, and this policy will be carried out if it is possible to get the consent of the contending parties. Should success crown his efforts we shall soon witness the end of the war in Cuba, and peace, prosperity, with liberty added, once more restored to that stricken island.

A Just Decision.

The trial of the two newspaper correspondents at Washington who declined to give to the senate investigating committee the sources of their information on which certain publications were made regarding the sugar trust, ended, as every right-minded citizen hoped it would, in their acquittal. Any other result would have been a blow at the liberty of the press and the people.

The court very properly held that a witness cannot be compelled to divulge the source of confidential communications made to him, and that the questions asked the two correspondents were irrelevant. To take from the newspaper man the right to hold sacred the trusts that are imposed in him would be to compel him to violate confidences and deprive him of his professional credit. In rendering his decision Judge Bradley not only vindicated the two correspondents, but awarded a victory to journalism and the public.

Keely has exhibited his wonderful motor again, and as on other occasions the expert scientists who witnessed it came away bewildered and amazed. That Keely has discovered a new and mysterious force hitherto unknown to science there can be no doubt, but this remarkably patient man must show that it is commercially available before it will yield him either the glory or the fortune for which he has sought so many years.

MONDAY MORNING MISFITS.

There is no telling to what extremes conscienceless corporations will go in repressing everything human in their employees. A case in point will serve as a diagram for the foregoing outbreak. A Cincinnati street car company having exhausted the ten commandments and their relative bearing on every conceivable action of man, resorted to a pragmatic method not long ago and issued a firm forbidding any of its conductors wearing button hole bouquets. There was one who loved flowers, who persisted in gratifying his passion, and the consequence was his suspension for one week. The worst that could be said about him was that he was occasionally gay and cheerful. He had a fine sense of humor, and was a very inconsiderate person. He was a very inconsiderate person. He was a very inconsiderate person.

Speaking of little things one does not know what great results they may sometimes work. The trickling crack in the levee soon works itself into a gaping crevasse, and constant dripping has been known to wear away the hardest granite. Now, doubtless, sometimes are the small things of life, but too liberal indulgence is very apt to produce discord in the internal harmonies of man. As incidental as they frequently are to the divergent processes of the human body one ever heard of them being persons non grata to a steamship? Yet such is the fact, and this is how it happened. The other day the revenue cutter Chandler was making for quarantine in New York harbor, when her engines gave vent to a wheezing asthmatical cough, and then stopped. Her mechanical arrangements appeared to be altogether out of sorts, and it was some time before the cause was discovered. The paralysis was induced by one of the crew, a young fellow named Tom. Upon examination it was found that a doughnut had been sucked from the river through an open valve into the condenser and had lodged there, bringing about the disability which had forced the vessel to return. This unusual occurrence suggests the problem: "If a man takes one doughnut to give a steamship, how many will it require to throw a man into involuntary spasms. I think this can be solved without extracting the cube root of the unknown quantity, or squaring the circle of the doughnut."

It is unpleasant enough to run across the bad spelling of people in the ordinary walks of life, but when college professors are found guilty of the elision or addition of letters to words the shock is somewhat intensified. You would hardly believe it, but it is true nevertheless, that in a recent examination of candidates for graduation in the normal college of New York City, on the printed examination slips one "r" was jerked out of "narrate," the letter "e" usurped the place of an "a" in the final syllable of "grammar," and the second syllable of "measles" was reversed, appearing as "measles." This was nothing, however, compared to the admission cards distributed by the president of the City College of New York, where the word "geography" was mutilated by the interjection of an extra "r," making it read "g-e-o-r-g-e-r-a-p-h-y." Surely the schoolmaster has been very much abroad in that locality.

Bad spelling is a very common fault. Sometimes it is owing to carelessness with a certain class of people, but more frequently it is crass ignorance. In a reminiscent way I can recall the fad of spelling matches that prevailed in Wheeling many years ago. There was a contest between picked teams of the Waverly Literary Society, of the Grand memory of the Sigourney Society of the Wheeling Female College. I cannot state with any degree of certainty which won the fight, but I do remember how one of the Waverly team fell down on the same simple word of "grammar." He had spelt one round successfully with "elegramary," and landed clean on the neck of "syndactylise," but "grammar" clinched and wrestled him all around the ring, and in the break-away gave him an upper cut, and when the gong sounded he was counted out. According to his orthography grammar contained that interloping "e." That unskilful young man, who never became a lawyer of this city, and if this strikes his eye he will, perhaps, remember the incident with a compassionate feeling for that slip of the bright green days of his life without cherishing any bitter feelings towards me.

Unfortunately there are many good average spellers who are tripped up on words in common use. The more difficult ones are correctly written on account of the peculiar combination of letters, and for the reason that anything out of the common rut makes a deeper impression on the mind and is more firmly retained by memory. One can never be taught to be a good speller by sound, for pronunciation is often arbitrary. I once handed the manuscript of a farewell sermon preached by a prominent divine, who was leaving his charge to accept the presidency of a celebrated college, and I found the word valleys four times spelled "vailles." So it goes. Why can't we apply the same treatment to Shakespeare, localize the scenes and characters. Wouldn't this be hot stuff that I have just paraphrased: (Act I, scene I, Market street, midnight, several roystering young gentlemen of the elite at the porticulis of the castle of Grambrinus.)

cochee cochee ballet, sky rockets and pin wheels this ought to be legitimate: "Alas poor Yorick. I used to be up against him pretty warm, Horatio. A fellow full of infinite jokes, tricks, short cards and loaded dice. He was a policy writer, too, of rare skill, and many times and oft were the gigs and straddles he placed for me. Now he is not worth a 'blunk.' To such complexion must we come at last unless we take Freen's Curvive for the mumps."

"Hold up, don't go away yet. I have another on Dick Plantagenet. Yes, Richard III, of course. Well that old horse gag of his could be worked over like this: Rushing on the stage after taking a header over a tomato can, he cries out: 'A bicycle, a bicycle, my tire's busted; any old thing will do—'"

WARM WEATHER WISDOM.

Philadelphia Bulletin: Time, which vindicates a man, first buries him. Very few girls under twenty are old enough to be polite. Have you ever noticed how dead a dead fish looks? It is pretty hard to decide on the meanest man you ever saw.

When a girl tells a young man stories on her kin, that settles it; she loves him. It probably pleases every man to receive a letter which speaks of enmeshing on his "valuable time."

Many a man "who claims to be a 'sport'" is a plain drunkard and a black-guard. What on earth do loafers think about when they stand for hours on a street corner alone? A model husband lets his wife have her own way, even when he knows it is not good for her.

Everybody has acquaintances, but nobody has friends. Every woman probably believes that in borrowing from her neighbor, she gets a little the worst of it.

"Taxing the Breakfast Table."

The poor man had his breakfast table taxed an additional $2,000,000 this afternoon.—Free-Trade Newspaper.

A lot of free traders care about the poor man's breakfast table! There never was so little on that table as since the Wilson law went into operation, but no crocodile tears dampened the free trade newspapers over the absolute barrenness of the table until the new tariff law promised to put bread and meat on the table.

The poor man is willing to pay for his breakfast if only he can earn the money with which to pay for it. What he wants is breakfast. The free trader tells him he is a fool to want breakfast, because he would have to buy it with his labor; that it is better to have your breakfast table untaxed than to have anything to eat. But the poor man's stomach teaches him that he needs and must have breakfast.

A tax on the poor man's breakfast table, indeed! Give him a chance to earn his breakfast every day, and he will take care of the tax on it.—New York Press.

Some Truths a Little Fiction.

A woman never forgives a man for undersanding her. Ananias and Sapphira had probably got used to it with the tax collector. Love is back of half the fool breaks a man makes and indigestion is back of the other half.

A widower is always afraid that if he doesn't act broken-hearted all the women will talk about him, and if he does none of them will look at him. A girl always seems to think the men won't think she has a happy disposition unless she shows her teeth when she has a photograph taken.

When the minister says there will be no marriage in heaven all the old maids look pleased, because they think they will have the laugh on the other women.—New York Press.
